Prescription Drug Take Back Day Set for Oct. 24

In partnership with local law enforcement, National Prescription Drug Take Back Day acts as a reminder to get rid of any unused or expired medications. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration holds this event biannually, and this year's Prescription Drug Take Back Day will fall on Saturday, Oct. 24 from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

"Since 2010, Take Back Day has helped Americans remove more than twenty million pounds of unneeded medications from their homes," said DEA Administrator Terry Cole. "By participating in Take Back Day, you are preventing potentially addictive medications from falling into the wrong hands – a small step that can save lives. I am grateful to the thousands of law enforcement and community partners who make these events possible, and I urge everyone to take a few minutes on Saturday, October 24, to clean out your medicine cabinets."

Items that will be collected include tablets, capsules, patches, other forms of prescription medications and liquid medications securely sealed in their original containers.

Items that will not be collected include syringes, sharps and illicit drugs.

"I'm encouraging everyone to take just a few minutes to gather any medications they no longer need," said Special Agent in Charge Jim Scott, head of DEA's Louisville Field Division. "By dropping off your unneeded or expired medications at an authorized collection site, you're making our community safer by keeping those drugs out of the hands of anyone who might otherwise abuse them."

Visit DEATakeBack.com to find a registered Take Back location near you. If you are unable to participate in this fall's National Prescription Drug Take Back Day, there are more than 15,300 pharmacies, hospitals, and businesses that offer safe medication disposal year-round. In addition, many police departments also provide permanent drop boxes to ensure Every Day is Take Back Day.

Keep Houseplant Pests Out in the Cold This Fall

ADAM THOMAS

When you bring houseplants indoors before temperatures get too cold, be sure to leave pest problems out in the cold. A rule of thumb is to bring plants in before night temperatures drop below 50 degrees Fahrenheit to allow plants to adjust to warmer indoor temperatures. It's a good idea to inspect plants for pest problems several weeks before you plan to bring them inside. This precaution gives you ample time to take care of any insect or disease problems.

To combat foliar diseases, indicated by yellow, black or brown spots on leaves, remove and destroy the affected leaves; leave ample space between plants; avoid wetting foliage; and move plants to a less humid area. Root and stem rot diseases usually occur under extremely wet soil conditions; so provide good drainage and avoid over-watering plants. You usually can control small infestations of common insects, limited to a few plants, without using insecticides. For example, spray plants with water to wash off mites, or use a swab dipped in rubbing alcohol to remove light infestations of aphids, mealybugs and scale. To eliminate heavy infestations, use a soft brush or cloth dampened with soapy water solution of two tablespoons of mild soap per gallon of water.

If you decide to use a conventional insecticide on heavy infestations, always follow the manufacturer's label instructions. Insects can cause serious problems on plants inside during the winter, because the natural predators that help control these pests outside are not in your home. So, separate the plants you've just brought in from others for several weeks to ensure the newcomers don't have insects that might travel to the other plants. Regularly inspect all plants to control inconspicuous pests you might not notice until a serious problem develops.

Once you bring plants inside, provide a favorable growing environment including light, humidity and fertility. And remember, most plants don't like to be in a draft. Optimum conditions reduce the chance of disease problems. Some symptoms are leaf edge and tip death, leaf drop, yellow leaves and spindly growth.
