Heaven Is A Lot Like Kentucky

When my soul's sinkin'

"The discoveries of Psychometry will enable us to explore the history of man, as those of geology enable us to explore the history of the earth. There are mental fossils for psychologists as well as mineral fossils for the geologists; and I believe that hereafter the psychologist and the geologist will go hand in hand — the one portraying the earth, its animals and its vegetation, while the other portrays the human beings who have roamed over its surface in the shadows, and the darkness of primeval barbarism! Aye, the mental telescope is now discovered which may pierce the depths of the past and bring us in full view of the grand and tragic passages of ancient history!"

"Oh, Baby, I got one!" I heard Amber say with excitement in her voice, on a recent archaeological adventure on our property along Fleming Creek, in central Fleming County. known locally as the fading community of Martha

Amber and I, and our 'Number One Son', Cassidy, have been looking around the property off and on for aver a year.

On that particular outing, our good friend, Johnny Jett, known far and wide as a master craftsman and one of two stars from Fleming County you may have seen on Barnwood Builders TV program, had executed some backhoe work in an attempt to find the exact location of the mill that once stood there.

"Backhoe archaeology 101," is what Johnny called

Although we didn't find any millstones Amber did find a nice Native American artifact, a bifurcated Paleo-era projectile, known as a 'Fox Valley' style.

Barnwood Johnny's Builder partner and fellow Fleming County craftsman, Sherman Thompson, is also a relic hunter and a future publication I am working on will be an effort to highlight folks like Johnny and Sherman and the wonderful artifacts they and I and Amber and Cassidy and others have been found through the

I am an avid student of history, particularly the pioneer and Native American history of northeast and central Kentucky. We have an abundance of fascinating history in the region of Kentucky we call home. The various, fresh water and saline springs that have flowed in abundance in our region have attracted the attention of Kentuckians for over 10,000 years.

Early Native American peoples, we identify and refer to as belonging to the "Paleo Culture" called our region home in very ancient times. The evidence of their existence is largely based on the stone projectile points they utilized in hunting, and those stone projectile points are very unique in their shape and are fairly easy to identify by archaeologist and collectors, alike.

The lance-shaped projectiles, which are commonly referred to as 'arrowheads', were never used with a bow and arrow. They were propelled by hunters through the use of an atlatl, or spear-throwing mechanism, which added extra power and force of propulsion through a special shaped device that acted as an extension of the hunter's arm, and was used to help throw spear points greater distances, with greater force, than simply throwing such projectiles over handed would

Archaeologists believe Paleo hunters and their families were nomadic in nature and though loosely belonged to large social groups of like-minded clans and extended families, mostly lived and travelled in groups that seldom exceeded three dozen individuals.

Members of the Paleo Culture were not at the top of the food chain. They were not even among the top five Alpha predators that lived in our region, and the fact that they were able to co-exist with an abundance of such aggressive and dangerous animals (large predatory cats such as saber-toothed tigers, dire wolves, grizzly bears and other, now-extinct and larger bear family groups, mountain lions, and large grey wolf packs) for thousands of years, lends testament to their ability to master their environment and thrive in extremely dangerous times.

Though commonly characterized as being 'big game hunters' who pursued large fauna such as big-horn bison and a variety of elephant species, paleo people primarily focused on plant foraging and hunting, fishing and trapping, smaller species, though they did pursue larger game like the bison and elephants.

Over 350 Paleo sites have been studied in Kentucky and more research is being conducted all the while.

I recently watched a short horror movie on You-Tube, and I was shocked by a moment of recogni-

The story called Tunnel, only seven minutes long, involved a hiker enjoying his day walking through the woods, hills, and riverside (the movie was shot in Connecticut) on a summer day. He's enjoying the wilderness and taking photos along the way. He comes upon an old railroad tunnel in a hillside, and just for fun, he pulls out a kazoo and squeals into the tunnel, expecting an echo. Several seconds pass before he hears the sound return, but it's different. He does it a few more times and is increasingly unsettled by the returning sounds. He attempts to leave the woods, but he keeps stumbling back into the area by the tunnel. Desperate to find a way out, he walks into the darkness of the tunnel and doesn't return. I won't give away the ending, but that's the gist of the short movie. It also reminded me of a novel I finished earlier this year, This Wretched Valley, by Jenny Keifer, a Kentucky writer, in which the group of protagonists are 'stuck" in a location that they can't seem to escape, always winding back where they started.

The more I thought about it, the more I realized that this is how I feel most days, stuck in a routine at work and at home that seemingly offers no way out. No matter which direction I move or different route I take, here I am back again in the same place. I don't hate my job, and I certainly don't hate my home life, but whenever I contemplate doing something different, circumstances always seem to conspire to put me back on the same track. It's mysterious and a little unsettling, just like the non-echo that returns to the hiker in the

I have never been a person of habit. In my youth, despite the routine of the school day, I resisted conforming to it in every way possible. I was bored most of the time, and I looked for ways to escape. I've never liked schedules or an overly planned day. That's why the activity of hiking appeals to me so much - I can make my own path when I get tired of the one I'm on. I will always return home, but maybe just not along the same path that led me away. That's just the way

I am. I'm sure I drive my wife crazy.

This shock of recognition I received from the little film has given me incentive to investigate exactly what forces I feel are pushing me to "stay on the path." I'll let you know how it goes in a future column.

This is stress-free awareness month. I know everyone out there has had stress at one time or another, and some when over you could laugh at, but other times life-changing. Although at the time just the small insignificant ones can be a major problem for that person.

I can say for the most part I have been very lucky only a few times has the stress of life gave me any problems. I was fortunate to find something to counter the stressful feelings. Physical activity was my ticket, running as my main area and still is today as it is a part of my life now. I know very few like running, but there is many other things that can help when things become stressful. Things such as painting, playing music, all types of crafts, even strange things to as mowing the yard. I even know two myself that will jump on the mower to relieve stress of the day! I don't know what happens during the winter maybe they have no stress through those months. The lawn mower people probably think running up and down town hill is a little strange as well.

It is not only good to have a hobby, especially a hobby to make you healthy, but to have one that is fun. Having a hobby that is fun goes a long way in taking care of any stressful situation. Dad always told mom sing Pooh, it will make you feel better. If I sang in a crowd, I don't really know how the others would be though. One of my stress release activities that is not active is coloring when in for the night, or storming I pull out the ole coloring book and markers. I use markers due to my less than average abilities with a crayon, as I have stated in earlier writings.

Also what I am doing right now is another activity I enjoy, thanks to mom getting me started. If you are reading this and don't really have a hobby, you should try to come up with one. It is never too late to start improving your health, and it has been proven you can start at ANY AGE. Take it from me, you will feel better well after the pain of starting)))). But anything that takes your mind off being aggravated is worth it. That said take care of yourself, mother nature, and remember always BE
