Motherdaughter rift puts dad in a tough spot

Dear Abby: My daughter, "Violet," lives about two hours away. She and her mother (my wife) do not get along. Violet was always a rebellious, independent wild child, as well as the source of a lot of family problems. Violet and I also were estranged until we recently reconciled.

Yesterday, she sent me an email inviting me to lunch to celebrate my birthday. When I told my wife about the invitation, she re> sponded, "Do what you want" in a tone and with a facial expression which said: "Go ahead, but if you do, you'll be sorry." I have tried to reconcile these two women I love without success. My wife tells me she loves Violet but doesn't like her, although she would like to have a better relationship with her. Violet tells me she blames her mother for her PTSD (her unofficial diagnosis) and wants nothing to do with her. So do I go to lunch with my daughter and incur the wrath of my wife for what she would consider a betrayal, or do I decline the invitation from my daughter and risk alienating her again? — In The Middle In New Jersey Dear In The Middle: Your wife is wrong to attempt to use you to punish her troubled daughter. It would benefit all three of you if Violet were properly diagnosed. Before having that birthday lunch, ask your doctor if he or she can give you the name of some doctors who specialize in diagnosing and treating PTSD. During the lunch, tell Violet you love her, but this split in the family isn't good for any of you, which is why you are giving her the names of doctors who can help her work through her trauma. An alternative to that might be family counseling for the three of you.

Dear Abby: I reconnected with my high school first love. Unfortunately, both of us were married. His wife didn't win her battle with cancer and passed away. I eventually got a divorce. All through this time, we were intimate, spending as much time together as we could. (We live in different cities.)

It has been eight months since we reconnected, and I'm ready for a relationship. I know he's nowhere near healed or close to ready to be in another relationship. This is the third time in our lives we have been brought together and couldn't "be" together. I don't know whether to let go or to wait. Please help. — One Who Got Away

Dear One: Perhaps the third time will be the charm because you are now both single. While you may have to wait for this man to finish grieving for the wife to whom he was unfaithful, it may be time for an honest conversation about your feelings for him and whether he's on the same page. It is important you both figure out whether this is the real thing or just another attempt to resurrect a teenage romance.

Sufficient vitamin D and calcium is crucial for bone growth

'Contamination"

S.W.A.T.

Dear Dr. Roach: I am considering a new supplement to help my bones. My recent DEXA scan shows osteopenia with a T-score of 1.1 in my lumbar spine. My hips have a T-score of -1.5, and my FRAX 10-year risk score for hip fracture is 3.4%. The supplement contains plantbased calcium, magnesium, vitamin D3, vitamin K3, boron, selenium, and other trace minerals. Is this a good idea? — M.C.

Dear M.C.: One authority recommends pharmacologic treatment, such as a bisphosphonate drug, for people with a 10-year risk for hip fracture above 3%, so your doctor should give consideration to this kind of treatment. With or without the treatment of a prescription drug, I do believe that getting adequate calcium and vitamin D is important for bone health. Essentially every study including prescription medication also used supplemental calcium and vitamin D. People with magnesium deficiency should get magnesium as deficiency can lead to metabolic bone problems. The data on vitamin K3 in Japan has been promising, but the studies in the United States haven't shown a benefit. Boron is not recommended as a treatment. Strontium supplements do increase bone density as strontium is taken up into the bone and blocks X-rays better than calcium. However, the only type of strontium shown to reduce fractures is not available in the U.S. Strontium sold as supplements may not have a benefit at all.

In summary, the vitamin D and calcium in the supplement you are considering are important, but the other components are unproven to be of benefit in reducing fracture risk. You will save money by just buying calcium and vitamin

Dear Dr. Roach: I am a 63-year-old healthy male. I am interested in getting the measles vaccine. The Centers for Disease Control say that I need one booster to be protected. The pharmacist says that I must take the full course of three shots. What gives? — R.R.

D separately.

Dear R.R.: Because of the ongoing outbreaks of measles in the U.S. and Canada, many readers and patients are asking me about vaccination guidelines for adults. Since you were born in 1961 or 1962, you cannot be assumed to have had measles, whereas people born before 1957 are extremely likely to have had measles.

S.W.A.T. "Ghosts"

S.W.A.T. "Crews"

One approach would be to check your blood levels for measles (called the IgG titer). If this is positive, you don't need a booster, but if it is negative, it's recommended to get two doses. (I'm not sure why the pharmacist said three doses since a full course is If you have documentation of two doses of the measles child, you don't need a booster. Unfortunately many people in their 60s no longer have their childhood records. One dose of the measles vaccine is reasonable for low-risk adults, but in an outbreak situation, having high protection from two doses is the safest measure.

DR. ROACH WRITES: A recent column on rosacea prompted two readers to write in that they had been misdiagnosed as having rosacea, when they had serious diseases instead (polycythemia vera and neuroendocrine cancer). Although these are rare, rosacea that doesn't clear up with standard treatments should lead to a consideration of
