

Shelby democrats encourage those who have 'had enough' to attend town hall

TAYLOR DAVIS
EDITOR

SHELBYVILLE – For folks who have “had enough” and wish to voice their concerns on local, statewide, and national issues, the Shelby County Democratic Party will soon host a town hall to provide a public outlet for the community.

“Folks that are disenchanting and have had enough of what's going on locally, regionally, and nationally can come speak in an open mic setting,” said Shelby County Democratic Party member Doug Butler.

At the event, members of the community may speak for up to three minutes on any topic they wish.

A sign outside the fairgrounds, where the event will be held, reads, “Come tell us why you've had enough.”

Butler encourages anyone, regardless of political affiliation, to come and voice their opinions in a public forum because residents currently have few options for expressing political concerns.

Butler emphasizes that even though the event is sponsored by the Shelby County Democratic Party, it is completely nonpartisan, and everyone is welcome to speak regardless of where they fall on the political spectrum.

“We felt like it was a community service that the democrats could sponsor,” said Butler.

According to Butler, the Shelby County Democratic Party does not endorse any candidates and does not advocate for any candidates who may be present at the event.

Some political attendees have already expressed that they will be in attendance, including retired colonel Pamela Stevenson, who serves as the Democratic caucus leader for the Kentucky House of Representatives and is currently
