did not act in lawful self-defense or defense of others to overcome justification," the Jackson County prosecutor's office said in a written statement.

An email seeking comment was sent to Miller's attorney.

The second-degree murder charge Miller initially faced carried a sentence of 10 years to life in prison.

But Missouri is among more than 30 states that have adopted some version of stand-your-ground laws over the past two decades. While earlier laws allowed people to use force to protect themselves in their homes, the stand-your-ground principle provides even broader self-defense rights regardless of the location.

Police and prosecutors have said the shooting barrage started when one group of people confronted another for staring at them. Lyndell Mays is accused of being the first person to start firing. After that, a 15-year-old began to shoot toward Mays and hit Miller, who also admitted firing several shots.

Authorities initially said ballistics linked the bullet that killed Galvan to a handgun Miller admitted firing, but prosecutors said in their latest statement that there wasn't enough evidence to confirm his shot caused Galvan's death. The statement said Galvan's family was consulted and that they understood the legal challenges.

"The greatest justice would be having Lisa back, but since that is not possible, accountability still matters," the family said in a statement released through the prosecutor's office. "We also share the hope expressed in court that change can come from this and that people recognize the importance of making better choices."

Mays, meanwhile, is scheduled to stand trial next year on charges that include second-degree murder. The 15-year-old involved was sentenced previously to a state facility for youths.

girls as we lost quite a few points," Edwards said. "But several girls already stepped up during the indoor season.

During the indoor season, he said Moore, Richmond and Harris made great strides.

He said the middle distance runners and the distance team have also showed a lot of improvement.

In addition, he's also looking for big years out of Lilly Terhune, Esther Van Zee, Jaya Johnson and Gretchen Gayle

"We expect all of these athletes to compete to qualify for state," said Edwards. "This is just naming a few names as I think I could go on and on."

Edwards is assisted by Les Harris, Taylor Lay, Todd Heady, Brian Carr, Jakob Woods and Cynthia Heady.

The team starts the outdoor season on Friday, March 13, with the North Oldham Relays at 5:30 p.m.
