

LEAGUE

over, but could have a lingering impact and offer an indication of what teams are positioned for tournament success. Roughly half of all Final Four teams and eventual champions since the expansion to 64 teams in 1985 won league titles; no team has won it all without reaching at least the semifinals of their conference tournament.

There is a short window to regroup, too. Most teams coming off playing at least four games in four days haven't survived the tournament's first weekend.

Yet there are unforgettable stories like Casey Morsell's N.C. State team two years ago, illustrating how the spectacle of March Madness captures the imagination every year. That team unexpectedly became only the second to win a league title with five games in five days before carrying that surge all the way to the sport's biggest stage at the Final Four.

"We had to really make it happen," the former Wolfpack guard said, "but with that, you have these miles that you're kind of adding up."

SPRINGBOARD OR BURDEN?
For decades, college basketball's major conferences generally had teams playing three games in three days in league tournaments. That was before waves of realignment began roughly two decades ago, gradually leading to sprawling leagues. Among power conferences in men's basketball, the Big East is the smallest at 11 schools; the Big Ten has 18.

That has led to longer

regular-season schedules followed by tougher tournament grinds, particularly for those without multi-round byes awarded to top seeds.
