able to assemble and how he uses those weapons.

“We are a hard team to guard. The only thing you can do wrong in Mark’s offense is not move,” Givens said.

At practice Givens has seen Pope have a drill where players can only have the ball in their hand for a half second before doing something with it.

“You have to be thinking about what to do with the ball before you catch it,” Givens said.

Pope also randomly asks players for three key words off the scouting report from a player they will be guarding in the next game. The UK coach also demands total silence at the shoot-around when players are shooting free throws.

“I asked him why he wants it totally quiet and he said because it might be the only five minutes of quiet time the players have all day where they just have to focus on what they are doing. He does things I have not seen before and it works for him.”

Givens marveled at what Pope did after he got the UK job to connect with former players.

“He had a meeting and called all the former players in. He individually called every player,” Givens said. “He asked everyone what he can do to make this thing better. Then he invited us to come around and these young guys saw us and thought it was amazing all these guys came around, so there must be something special here.”

Givens often watches practice and gets a chance to talk with Pope. He likes how the former UK team captain does things differently from other coaches.

“It’s fun talking to him because I learn stuff. He puts a lot into analytics. He even studies how long he can keep a guy in a game and how long he stays productive,” Givens said. “He told me Andrew Carr is a guy who the longer the game goes, the better he gets. But then he told me BG (Brandon Garrison) after two minutes he has to get him out but when he comes back he can go four or five minutes. Those are the kinds of things I had never heard a coach talk about.

Kentucky volleyball coach Craig Skinner has a terrific problem as his team prepares to start postseason play.

For the first time since mid-September, he has both senior Erin Lamb and freshman Asia Thigpen healthy and able to play.

“It’s a beautiful thing to have two talented players playing the same position that you can use,” Skinner said.

Lamb had not played in a SEC match until last week after having a non-volleyball medical issue sideline her two days before conference play started. She missed 13 matches.

“We are scrambling about what to do, lost a match and have had to work our tails off to get back,” Skinner said.

Kentucky was coming off an upset win at SMU and preparing to play at Purdue when Skinner learned Thigpen would be out with a knee injury. She eventually missed six matches, including the SEC opener at Auburn and two more conference matches, before returning.

“Asia is young but is so talented. Both of them play the same spot and
