Errors Are Inevitable

To err is human; to forgive divine. So goes the saying and we all know that everyone makes mistakes. Expecting perfection, or worse, demanding it, is not just unrealistic, it also causes people to hide or lie about their errors. There is a more intelligent way to deal with errors, and that is by telling ourselves and others that we should be honest and open about errors and try to learn from them. Of course not all errors are the same. A slip of the tongue rarely causes much harm, whereas slipping on icy pavement or having your car slide off the road threatens more serious harm. When it comes to moral errors, or sins, as it were, there is a similar gradation of harm. Cheating at solitaire may cause you to question your own integrity in minor matters whereas cheating on your beloved may cause everyone to question your integrity. But even in moral matters we should realize that we all make mistakes and should have the same attitude towards these types of mistakes as we do towards mistakes at work or in school. We should be open and honest about them and try to learn from them. Ask yourselves why you are drawn towards certain sins, and how you can best avoid them in the future. Finally, ask forgiveness of those you may have wronged, and especially yourself.
