Kentucky is among a handful of states where charter school's don't operate. "So Kentucky kids are really on the outside looking in, on what has been a resounding success — especially in urban areas," state Solicitor General Matt Kuhn said in defending the disputed law during the hearing in Danville, Kentucky. Byron Leet, one of two attorneys presenting for education groups opposed to the measure, countered that "there is nothing remotely resembling a consensus that charter schools are a wonderful thing." DEBATE OVER WHETHER CHARTER SCHOOLS ARE PUBLIC SCHOOLS Arguments focused on whether charter schools meet the constitutional standards of public schools. Charter schools would have to comply with student attendance standards, hire certified teachers, meet state standards for student performance and adhere to open records and open meetings laws, Kuhn said. "I think that House Bill 9 fits neatly in our tradition" of public schools, he said.
