Tips for supporting your child's mental health

BY MEGHAN L. MARSAC PH.D., PEDIATRIC PSYCHOLOGIST WITH KENTUCKY CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL

All children experience a range of feelings that can sometimes change quickly. It can be easy for adults to dismiss a child's feelings as an overreaction or "not a big deal," but adults have the opportunity to support children through all feelings

For those children who express worries, sadness, anger or other hard feelings, knowing when to seek help for your child can be a challenge. Worry, sadness or acting out every now and then is a normal part of being a kid. But if emotions and stress before these behaviors continue over time or start to affect daily life, it might be a sign that a child is struggling with their mental health.

Just like we care for children's physical needs like making sure they eat well or go to the doctor we also need to support their emotional and mental well-being. Addressing those concerns early and connecting your child with professional support can make a substantial difference for them as well as the whole family. With early intervention, whether through support at school, therapy or conversations at home, children are better equipped to manage problems grow bigger. When a child feels mentally strong, they build strong friendships, do better in school and are better prepared to face life's challenges.

As a parent or caregiver, you don't have to have all the answers; listening, showing love and taking children's thoughts and feelings seriously goes a long way. Lead by example and let them know that ask for help. By working talking about their feelings is ok. If you're not sure where to start, talk with your child's pediatrician for guidance and/or resources. Communities also play an important role. Teachers, coaches, family friends and neighbors can help by letting kids know it's okay to talk about what's bothering them and they can together to support men- to their pediatrician.
