Paul, always and forever known as Wally, was born in Lebanon, Kentucky, on June 28, 1931. He attended the University of Kentucky on the GI Bill, graduating in 1957 with a degree in mechanical engineering. After graduation Wally and Emma moved to Columbus, Ohio where Wally accepted a position with North American Aviation (later North American Rockwell). After leaving North American, he joined Rimrock Corporation, a leader in the die casting and foundry industries, retiring in 1996. Wally and Emma bought their first home and moved to Gahanna, Ohio in 1959, where they raised a family of two daughters and a son. They were founding members of St. Matthew Catholic Church. University of Louisville settles case with professor for almost $1.6M

LOUISVILLE — University of Louisville officials have agreed to pay almost $1.6 million in damages and attorneys’ fees to settle the lawsuit Josephson v. Ganzel brought by Alliance Defending Freedom attorneys representing a respected psychiatrist whom the university demoted, harassed, and ultimately fired for speaking out on the harms of “transitioning” children.

In September of last year, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit ruled that Josephson’s case should proceed to trial, declaring public university officials can be held personally accountable for censoring professors or retaliating against them as the University of Louisville did in Josephson’s case.

“After several years, free speech and common sense have scored a major victory on college campuses,” said ADF Senior Counsel Travis Barham. “As early as 2014, Dr. Josephson saw the truth behind dangerous procedures that activists were pushing on children struggling with their sex. He risked his livelihood and reputation to speak the truth boldly, and the university punished him for expressing his opinion—ultimately by dismissing him. But public universities have no business punishing professors simply because they hold different views. Dr. Josephson’s case illustrates why—because the latest and best science confirms what he stated all along. Hopefully, other public universities will learn from this that if they violate the First Amendment, they can be held accountable, and it can be very expensive.”

“I’m glad to finally receive vindication for voicing what I know is true,” said Josephson. “Children deserve better than life-altering procedures that mutilate their bodies and destroy their ability to lead fulfilling lives. In spite of the circumstances I suffered through with my university, I’m overwhelmed to see that my case helped lead the way for other medical practitioners to see the universal truth that altering biological sex is impossibly dangerous while acceptance of one’s sex leads to flourishing.”

The university hired Josephson to head up the then-struggling Division of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry and Psychology, which he turned around into a program that received a national reputation for its work. He received high praise from both the university and outside psychiatric associations for his work. Josephson was also sought out for advice on how to improve and lead other child and adolescent psychiatry divisions.

But when Josephson, during a Heritage Foundation panel discussion, spoke in his personal capacity against subjecting children to harmful drugs and surgery in radical, misguided attempts to treat gender dysphoria, university officials—responding to demands from activists at the university’s LGBT Center—demoted him to the role of a junior faculty member and stripped him of his teaching duties. University officials then conspired to get him fired. These efforts included keeping an “Allan tracking document,” solicited complaints from alumni who were coached on what to say, and discussing the need to generate “strong documentation” to avoid his reappointment. In February 2019, the university announced that it would not renew his contract, terminating his employment at the university after nearly 15 years of distinguished service.

In light of the settlement and the agreement on attorneys’ fees, ADF attorneys filed a stipulated dismissal of the remaining claims in the case on Monday.

Efforts to improve licensing services in recent years include expanded online and mail-in renewal options, mobile pop-up licensing events in rural counties, and the launch of a pilot program with the Kentucky State Police to streamline testing. The General Assembly should appropriate funding for new regional offices and passed legislation to allow third-party providers, such as AAA, to assist with license renewals starting later this year.

Before the REAL ID legislation took effect in 2019, Kentucky was the only state that issued licenses on a county-by-county basis, rather than through a state Department of Motor Vehicles. Higdon has cited this unique challenge of moving to a regional model as a key reason he is requesting a delay on behalf of Kentucky residents.

Kentucky’s statewide REAL ID adoption rate remains less than 40 percent. Advocates for a delay argue that immediate enforcement would disproportionately impact seniors, rural residents, and working families who may still struggle to secure a compliant ID in time.

Kentucky is not alone in low compliance rates. According to recent data analysis from CBS News, 17 states are less than 50 percent compliant with the REAL ID Act. Thirty states are less than 70 percent compliant.
