

Improperly licensed KY optometrists can keep practicing

The board that regulates optometrists in Kentucky has filed emergency regulations to address exemptions from licensure requirements it improperly granted some optometry graduates in recent years. But the Dec. 31 regulations, which took effect immediately, are drawing fire from critics who say they do nothing to explain the past actions of the Kentucky Board of Optometric Examiners or address whether optometrists who were exempted from mandatory exams are qualified to continue providing eye care to patients. “Our focus has always been on patient safety,” Dr. Jill Bryant, executive director of the National Board of Examiners in Optometry, or NBEO, said in an email. “We are deeply concerned that the people of Kentucky are still receiving treatment from improperly licensed optometrists who have never demonstrated that they can successfully pass national competency assessments — and, in some instances, have repeatedly failed those assessments.” The regulation allows any optometry graduate from 2020-2023 who has not passed all required licensure exams to do so by 2027. The board began granting waivers to testing requirements during the COVID-19 pandemic, citing travel and other restrictions. It continued to approve exemptions after the COVID emergency had ended, including in December 2023. The NBEO administers licensure exams for optometry graduates in all 50 states. The Kentucky Lantern reported in December that the national board had identified 21 optometrists in Kentucky who had gained licenses from 2020 through 2023 without passing “one or more” parts of the three-part national exam then required by state law. Among them was Dr. Hannah Ellis, the daughter of former board president Dr. Joe Ellis, a prominent Kentucky optometrist active in state and national optometry circles. He abruptly resigned from the board last month and has not responded to requests for comment. Several of the optometrists who had not met all requirements, including Hannah Ellis, were graduates of the University of Pikeville College of Optometry, which opened in 2016 as Kentucky’s only optometry school. Patient safety “forgotten?” The state board has not responded to multiple requests for comment from the Lantern and has made little public comment apart from two brief statements on its website, the most recent announcing the emergency regulations. The board “feels strongly that all licensees should possess the skills and knowledge to be granted a license,” the Dec. 31 statement said in part. But the emergency regulations fall short of that goal, according to the Kentucky Academy of Eye Physicians and Surgeons, which represents medical doctors who specialize in eye care.
