

Rocking and Writing: Favorite fall albums

My all-time favorite albums to enjoy during the fall have little to do with the season.

AARON SNYDER

It's more about my formative music-taste years and nostalgic moments.

But for conversational purposes, I'll invite you to email me some albums that are known for popular listening come autumn-time. What music makes you feel fall?

As I've mentioned before in this column, my musical collection is quite eclectic, but I certainly have my preferred genres.

My favorite fall albums happen to also be my favorite all-time albums, so maybe music just hits different for me during the months of September, October and November.

After further research, these three albums were actually released in the fall of their respective years, which makes sense, but my first experiences with them didn't always occur in those months.

Going in chronological order, the top three fall-listening personal choices (with their release dates) are: "Human Clay" by Creed (Sept. 28, 1999), "Metropolis Pt. 2: Scenes from a Memory" by Dream Theater (Oct. 26, 1999) and "Believe" by Disturbed (Sept. 17, 2002).

I discovered all three in high school, and they resonate with me to this day.
