Bittersweet

The word bittersweet refers to a plant associated with the autumn season when the world is ablaze and its dual orange color is often found in trips to the uplands. It is definitely a plant that I associate with happy times in the woods and fields with my dogs through the years. Yet, the term bittersweet evokes another feeling, one that in the context of life refers to experiences that evoke both happiness and sadness simultaneously. It captures the complexity of emotions where joy is intertwined with a sense of loss or longing.

My second excursion to western Kentucky this year certainly brought the emotions of the word bittersweet to my mind. Mostly to find upland birds now the necessity to travel is of paramount importance. Travels to this part of Kentucky have been a part of my life for well over twenty years. This year's purpose of the second trip west was to expose my new companion, Sal, to wild coveys of quail. Of course, Rayna and Andy made the trip as well, sort of as mentors. Sal has done well on released quail on other excursions but has not had a lot of contact with wild coveys which certainly are much more difficult to handle than their city cousins.

It's always a joy to hunt different types of country and the area that I hunt around Webster County is certainly different than the terrain around here. Seeing the deep red sunsets across vast fields of harvested grain is certainly a spiritual experience. It definitely lets you know your place in the vastness of this world, sort of like looking out over an endless ocean.

This journey was successful as the dogs did find five coveys of birds. One bunch was small but the others held 15-18 birds which is a pretty good size covey these days. Sal did just fine but still needs the experience that Rayna and Andy have gained from their many hunts.

But the hunts and subsequent finding of coveys of wild quail was certainly bittersweet. The joy of seeing the dogs coursing the fields and suddenly locking up on a solid point brought joy to both my heart and my mind. One day of the trip was spent hunting with the owner of some of the land I hunted where birds were found and was a pleasant experience as well. It's been quite a while since I hunted with someone younger than me and while not a youngster, he was certainly younger than me. His uncle and grandfather took him bird hunting and at one time he had his own English pointers. This was his first bird hunt in quite a while and his enjoyment with the dogs was apparent. It was a joy to me to have someone appreciate the beauty, power, and stamina of a bird dog. One statement from him and others in the areas that I hunt was that I was the first person that they had seen bird hunting in years. Quite a statement from an area that used to be the mecca for quail hunting in Kentucky.

As the last day drew to a close a last point was made by Andy with Sal backing on a group of birds that had been flushed previously. One bird was taken from the encounter and dry conditions made hunting the downed bird a little difficult but finally Sal picked the bird up and it was returned to hand. The point and the day are etched in my mind in a very good way but it is also where bittersweet thoughts crossed my mind. For it is scenes like this that have been imprinted in my memory for over fifty years. Days were when I lived in Scott County that six to eight coveys could be found in a days hunt. Alas, those days exist no more. I guess it is better to have loved and lost than to have never loved at all. Scenes such as Andy and Sal on point are now a thing of the past for me.

There are many things that are hard to comprehend in today's upland Kentucky. Biologists say bird decline it is due to habitat loss. And I have certainly seen this occur through the years both at home and in western Kentucky. Yet the coveys located on this trip were in bare minimum cover and the habitat around what I find in my home country would seem to be much more conducive to coveys than what was experienced on this western Kentucky trip. It's hard to comprehend the vanishing act around here.

Nostalgic memories were created on this trek through the acres of grain. And it brought back nostalgic memories of various dogs and their hunts through the years. Bittersweet, it means that life encompasses both pleasure and pain. Thankfully, the mind being what it is those pleasurable memories far outweigh the bad. Yet the bittersweet complexities of life allow for the sadness of loss to make the joy of the point that much more of a joy to my soul. When my prayer begins: Now I lay me down to sleep.... the bright light of all my dogs through the years and happy times we spent together encompasses my being and the pleasure definitely outweighs the pain. Bittersweet is a part of life.
