Amid protests, UK defends use of Flock cameras on campus

BY JESSE FRAGA
AND BETH MUSGRAVE
TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

LEXINGTON — Dozens of University of Kentucky students and employees marched through campus, protesting the university's use of Flock cameras and other surveillance measures.

Protesters raised concerns last week about the security technology and how the university is spending its money. The demonstration was organized by student-led group DeFlock UKY, with support from the UK's Intersectional Feminist Collective, Students for Justice in Palestine and the Young Democratic Socialists of America.

"End mass surveillance! Whose school? Our school! Flock out! Flock off!" they chanted.

Vinayak Kumar, a UK graduate student in mathematics, said he wants the university to remove its automatic license plate readers from campus and end its contract with the company.

"Essentially it's just mass surveillance," Kumar said. "It's basically something that we didn't agree to and it's being shoved upon us."

This isn't the only initiative at UK that aims to monitor university members' and the public's movements and speech.

UK installed artificial intelligence face scanners for door access into some buildings on campus this year, causing some concern despite assurances over privacy.

The university proposed a technology security policy on Nov. 2 that would bar people from discussing politics and other topics on UK devices and when connected to campus Wi-Fi, even on a personal device.

Bowl projections: Where Kentucky football could play if it misses playoff

BY JON HALE
TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Back-to-back losses to Tennessee and Florida have dropped Kentucky out of a position in the 12-team College Football Playoff lineup.

A slim possibility remains that No. 16 Kentucky could become the first three-loss team to earn an at-large bid in the 12-team playoff format, but it will need a lot of help in the form of losses from higher-ranked teamS.

Even if Kentucky falls short of the playoff as expected, Will Stein's first UK team will have a chance for a postseason showcase.

What bowl could Kentucky play in if it misses the playoff? Here are the options and latest projections.

CITRUS BOWL

After the 12-team playoff field is filled, the Citrus Bowl has the first pick of remaining SEC teams. Most years, that selection is the highest-ranked SEC team outside the playoff, which would be Kentucky as of today, but the Citrus can pick whichever SEC team it wants.

The results over the final two weeks could dramatically change the pecking order among SEC teams. Kentucky is currently the only three-loss team in the league, but there are seven teams at 6-4 with two games left.

POOL OF SIX BOWLS

If Kentucky is still on the board after the Citrus Bowl makes its pick, the SEC's bowl selection process becomes more complicated.

The ReliaQuest (Dec. 31 in Tampa, Florida); Music City (Dec. 30 in Nashville, Tennessee); Gator (Dec. 30 in Jacksonville, Florida); Liberty (Jan. 2 in Memphis, Tennessee); Texas (Dec. 31 in Houston); and Las Vegas (Dec. 31 in Las Vegas, Nevada) bowls hold the same weight in the process.
