hour of every day, regardless of weather.

Intermittent resources alone cannot meet that standard. When temperatures plunge and demand spikes, the grid depends on sources that deliver continuously and predictably. That is why baseload generation — particularly coal, supported by other firm resources — remains essential to Kentucky's reliability.

Short-term emergency measures can help avert blackouts, but they are no substitute for sound long-term planning. Retiring reliable sources before replacements can perform under extreme conditions puts communities at risk and leaves local governments managing the consequences.

Kentucky's grid has long supported affordable power, economic growth, and public safety. Preserving those strengths requires practical, fact-based decisions that reflect how the system actually operates. The laws of physics do not change during a winter storm.

Winter Storm Fern reminded us that energy policy is ultimately about people — keeping families safe, communities functioning, and local economies running even in the worst conditions. As we plan for the future, dependable baseload power must remain a cornerstone of Kentucky's energy strategy.

Daviess County Judge/Executive Charlie Castlen is a member of Dependable Power First Kentucky — a statewide coalition promoting energy security and economic well-being through an all-of-the-above approach to power generation.
