LOVE CONTINUED FROM PAGE TWO

"Reading those cards with Layla at night has become one of the best parts of our day," Kim shared. "We get to end the day sitting together, reading words from people who love us and are rooting for us. After everything that can feel scary or uncertain, that gives us something comforting to share. The way people have included and cared for my daughter touches a very special place in my heart."

The kindness has meant more than emotional encouragement. There are those who have stepped in to help keep their daily lives going.

"Whether it's my family spending a whole day helping me through treatment or someone making sure we have dinner when I'm too exhausted to think about food, that help eases real burdens for all of us," Kim said. "I couldn't do this without my family, and I'm deeply grateful for every person who has stepped in to help carry us through."

Among those who have remained a constant support for Kim is her own mother, Kathy Dennison.

Kim's parents, Kathy and Paul, operate Dennison's Roadside Market. Despite the demands of the business, Kathy has made herself available for her daughter's medical appointments, emergency room visits, and everyday needs.

"My parents run a busy roadside market, and October is their busiest month," Kim said. "I know how much needs both of their attention, but she leaves work to take me to appointments, brings me things I need, calls to check on me, and keeps showing up. She has done more for me than I could ever have asked her to do."

"I want to thank my mama so very much," Kim added. "She has been there for me since the beginning. She has made every doctor appointment, taken me for every ER visit, and has dropped everything to be there for me. I have always known she loved me, but I don't think I understood the depth of that love until I watched her take care of me through this."

Kim understands how much time and attention the business requires, making her mother's willingness to set aside those responsibilities especially meaningful.

During Kim's first chemotherapy treatment, her mother, Kathy, and her brother, Brian, spent approximately eight hours helping her use cold caps in an effort to preserve her hair. The caps had to be changed every 25 minutes, with Brian managing the caps in dry ice and monitoring their temperature while Kathy fitted each one onto her daughter's head and secured it in place.

"I really don't want to lose my hair, and they understood how much trying to keep it meant to me," Kim explained. "Because it was important to me, it was important to them. That right there is love. They gave their time, their energy, and their whole day to something that mattered to me while I was going through something frightening. I couldn't have managed it without them, and I can't imagine going through this without them beside me."

For Kim, watching her mother care for her through cancer has brought a deeper understanding of the love and worry that come with being a parent.

"Being a mama myself, I know how badly you want to protect your child from anything that hurts," Kim said. "Now I'm watching my own mama face something she can't take away from her little girl. I wish I could take that worry away from her, too."

"There have been moments when I've been scared, hurting, and so exhausted I didn't know what I needed - except that I needed my mama," Kim continued. "I'm a grown woman with a child of my own, but I'm still her daughter, and having her beside me has meant more than I can explain."

Kim also shared a personal message of gratitude for her mother, acknowledging the sacrifices Kathy has made throughout her illness.

"Mama, I see everything you're doing. Even when I'm quiet or too tired to say much, I notice," Kim shared. "Thank you for taking care of me and loving my family through this. You are my very best friend, and I could not do this without you...I wish I didn't need you in this way right now. But Mama, I am so thankful I have you."

And it is that same love that Kim has tried to give Layla Kate throughout her own experience. When she first learned of her diagnosis, Kim struggled with how to tell her daughter. Rather than simply sitting her down for a conversation, she decided to create something Layla Kate could hold on to whenever she needed reassurance.

Kim wrote a book titled "A Little Story About Something Big" and had it printed at Walgreens. The book begins with the love between a mother and daughter before explaining Kim's breast cancer diagnosis. Its message is one of facing difficult circumstances together, even when the future is uncertain.
