league's general medical committee. NFL Executive Vice President Jeff Miller, who oversees health and safety, is on KSI's board of directors. "Kelci's commitment to Korey's legacy and the good that can come from it is exceptional and probably unusual that somebody can channel tragedy into something so constructive," Miller said. "It's fair to say she and the advocacy she has pursued has saved numerous lives across all levels of sports."

HEAT MANAGEMENT REMAINS A VITAL PART OF NFL MEDICAL MATTERS

This summer in the U.S. has been marked by persistent heat waves, creating particular danger for strenuous exercise —

SEC schools have made eight playoff appearances. The Big Ten had four schools total seven playoff berths.

Certain metrics support the idea that the 16-team SEC is stronger than the 18-school Big Ten at the bottom. ESPN's Bill Con-even for well-conditioned professional athletes.

As highs routinely rise past 110 degrees in Las Vegas, the Raiders with new coach Klint Kubiak have been starting practice at 7:30 a.m. at their suburban facility.

The Arizona Cardinals started camp inside State Farm Stadium, but when they move outside in a couple of weeks they'll do their on-field work in the morning.

"We don't need to mess with the heat," new coach Mike LaFleur said. Air conditioning means artificial turf, though, which players dislike for the increased injury risk and harder overall toll on their bodies.

"The heat's good. It's a good exposure. We're trying to find different margins when we can kind of minimize that when it's not necessary, but when we do most of the bulk of football we want to be outside as much as we can," said New Orleans Saints coach Kellen Moore, who has his team stretch inside before heading out.

The ideal balance, of course, is between being overexerted and being underprepared.

"We have an advantage to go into the year knowing we've been in the heat," Saints tight end Juwan Johnson said.
