Beyond Williams, there was also a positive, of sorts, update on Morton, who was said to have suffered a possibly serious knee injury in practice just ahead of media day and Big Blue Madness.

There, it was said that Morton would be getting a second evaluation in the near future and the severity of the knee was not known.

Luckily again for Pope, things seem to be trending in a positive direction on that front, too, even if it's still not known when he'll be able to return.

"Jerone Morton is continuing to work through his knee injury," the spokesperson said. "He's been re-evaluated by doctors. We continue to get good news about Jerone, but he's still a little bit away from a return."

Unfortunately, they can't all be winners.

On the final front, Noah, a third-year returning in-state player from Harlan County, there is still little to be said.

Despite Noah himself speaking of his positive attitude and renewed love for the game he's dedicated much of his life to, the update around his hamstring, which was his second separate hamstring issue as he'd tell it, remains... incomplete.

"Trent Noah has a hamstring injury," the UK spokesperson said. "He's week-to-week with no hard timeline on his return."

In essence, as far as Noah was concerned, there was hardly much of an update at all from his previous status. He did not participate in Big Blue Madness nor did he play in UK's first scrimmage against Little Rock, though none of the three mentioned did. Williams, however, did participate in the BBM 3-point contest, though he failed to defeat Alex Wilkins.

Regardless, Kentucky is preparing for its second scrimmage of the preseason, against Texas Tech, on Friday and it seems unlikely that any of the three hurt Cats will feature in the showdown with the Red Raiders.

In spite of that, there is reassuring news surrounding Williams and Morton as they continue working their way back.
