

Resurrection stories

In October 2006, Jeff Markin walked into the emergency room at Palm Beach Gardens Hospital in Florida and collapsed from a massive heart attack. Medical staff worked on him for a long time. His heart had stopped, he was flatlined for approximately 40 minutes, and his body showed clear signs of death (his extremities had turned black). The team was preparing to move him to the morgue.

Cardiologist Dr. Chauncey Crandall felt prompted to pray for the man. He prayed specifically for Markin's soul and asked God to raise him if it was his will. After the prayer, they shocked him one more time. Suddenly a normal heartbeat returned. Markin later woke up with no significant brain damage — something doctors said should have been impossible after that long without a pulse. Dr. Crandall, a respected cardiologist, has publicly shared this account in detail in his book “Raising the Dead” and in multiple interviews. He describes it as a clear miracle.

Stories like this force us to confront the claims of John 11. When Jesus stood before the tomb of His friend Lazarus, who had been dead four days, He declared, “I am the resurrection and the life. The one who believes in me will live, even though they die” (John 11:25). Then He called Lazarus out of the grave. The same Jesus who raised Lazarus is still at work. Before this Jesus had raised two other people from the dead: The widow's son at Nain (Luke 7:11-17) and Jairus' daughter (Matthew 9:18-26, Mark 5:21-43, and Luke 8:40-56).

Throughout church history, early church leaders such as Augustine reported raisings of the dead attested by local eyewitnesses. A second-century source links the conversion of a Mesopotamian bishop in the year 99 to a dead person being raised through the prayers of a Syrian evangelist. John Wesley recorded in his journal that on Christmas Day 1742 he prayed for a man who appeared dead, and the man revived. Historical records of Catholic evangelist Vincent Ferrer also include multiple accounts of the dead being raised during his preaching across Europe.

In our own day, reports continue to surface from places where the gospel is advancing rapidly: China, India, Mozambique and parts of Africa. It is noteworthy that dramatic miracles often occur among people hearing the message of Jesus for the first time. Miracles and the spread of the gospel frequently travel together.

Western culture tends toward skepticism. The philosopher David Hume argued that miracles violate the laws of nature and that only “ignorant and barbarous” nations believe in them. Yet modern surveys tell a different story. A 2026 survey by the American Bible Society in partnership with CBN News found that 35% of Americans say they have personally experienced or witnessed a divine healing. In many parts of the world, people turn to God in desperate situations because they have no other hope. They are not anti-medicine; they simply need a miracle. And often they receive one. I can certainly add my name to the list of those who have witnessed divine miracles. I have seen God use me to bring physical healing to people, but just as miraculously spiritual and
