particularly in rural and underserved communities, university leadership has said.

EKU's plan also extends to the residency positions that graduates will need after they earn their degrees.

During a recent meeting to brief KMA representatives on the status of the proposed medical school and EKU's plans for graduate medical education, KMA President Dr. Christine Ko and KMA Executive Vice President Cory Meadows voiced the organization's support of EKU's efforts.

"Kentucky physicians see firsthand the challenges that workforce shortages create for patients and communities," Ko said in a prepared statement. "EKU's proposed College of Osteopathic Medicine and its commitment to expanding rural residency training offer a promising opportunity to address these challenges and improve access to quality care for Kentuckians. KMA is proud to support this important initiative."

The proposed College of Osteopathic Medicine will be located on EKU's campus in Richmond and is being developed with a $50 million appropriation from the Kentucky General Assembly. The university will be pursuing accreditation through the Commission on Osteopathic College Accreditation and plans to enroll its first class in fall of 2031.
