expected world-wide impact of the research conducted in the Department of Veterinary Sciences," said James Matthews, associate dean for research in the college.

Foal health is central to a $650,000 project led by Feng Li, to study antigenic and genetic diversity in equine rotaviruses. Equine rotavirus A is a major cause of severe diarrhea in foals under six months old and can become rapidly fatal if left untreated. Annual outbreaks during foaling season create health and economic concerns for breeding farms.

Li's project will develop genetic tools to isolate and study equine rotaviruses, examine how the viruses change over time and determine how those changes affect the immune system's ability to recognize and fight infection. The work could help guide next-generation vaccine strategies for equine rotavirus and related diseases in other agricultural animals.

In that same vein, Yosra Helmy, Ph.D., principal investigator of a $300,000 project, will study alternatives to classical antibiotics for treating subclinical R. equi pneumonia in foals. The bacterial disease can cause serious illness and losses on horse farms, and treatment has become more difficult as some strains respond poorly to current antibiotics.

With few vaccines available, Helmy's team will test small molecules that stopped R. equi growth in early laboratory work and study how well they prevent the bacteria from infecting equine lung immune cells.

The goal is to identify safer, more effective treatment candidates while reducing reliance on traditional antibiotics.
