on individual leaf blades. However, larvae feed inside the stems of grasses and, when big enough, begin feeding on the crown of the plant, which is the growth point located at the base of grasses. If left unchecked, ABW can kill large swards of turfgrass. This is especially problematic on golf courses where turf is valued for its aesthetic appeal and used as the playing surface for the sport. “We know a lot about the ABW’s biology and seasonal activity in the Northeast, but we don’t know when the different life stages are active here in Kentucky and when populations peak in abundance,” said Caleb Wilson, assistant professor of Urban Landscape Entomology at UK. “A big part of this research project is to better understand the ABW’s seasonal activity in different parts of the Bluegrass region where this critter is established so that superintendents across Central Kentucky can manage it more effectively.”

The Kentuckiana Golf Course Superintendents Association provided a gift to fund this project to help advance UK’s turfgrass research in the region.
