

House steps up to protect children with anti-grooming measure

A middle school student starts getting extra attention from an adult at school. It begins with compliments and small favors. Soon there are private messages, encouragement to keep secrets, and reassurance that no one else really understands them. Nothing overtly criminal happens at first. By the time the behavior becomes unmistakably wrong, the child is already isolated, confused, and afraid to speak up.

This example is fictional, but it is drawn from patterns law enforcement and families across Kentucky have described again and again.

In another case, a trusted authority figure offers mentorship to a young person struggling at home. The relationship seems supportive on the surface. Over time, boundaries erode. Conversations become inappropriate. The child is conditioned to accept behavior he or she knows feels wrong, but has been taught to normalize. The harm does not begin with physical abuse. It begins with manipulation.

This is grooming. And Kentucky law has struggled to clearly define it. Lawmakers are working to fix this problem with HB 4, which passed the House unanimously on the 20th day of the session. The bill would formally define grooming and make it a criminal offense, recognizing it as a deliberate and calculated process used to gain access to vulnerable children for exploitation or abuse. It is an important and overdue step toward protecting kids before irreversible harm occurs.

Grooming is not accidental. It is not a misunderstanding. It is not innocent relationship-building that gets misinterpreted after the fact. It is a pattern of behavior that predators use intentionally, often patiently, to break down a child's defenses and silence them long before abuse is visible to the outside world.

The legislation was brought forward in response to concerns raised directly by families who encountered grooming firsthand. Parents, law enforcement, and prosecutors discovered that while existing laws addressed abuse after it happened, they did not adequately account for the warning signs that come earlier. The absence of a clear legal definition also makes it harder to intervene when red flags were obvious but the conduct had not yet crossed into physical abuse.

HB 4 seeks to fix this, spelling out what grooming looks like and attaching meaningful consequences to it. Penalties are based on the age of the child and whether the adult involved holds a position of trust or authority. After all, when those in a position of trust exploit their access to children, the betrayal compounds the harm and deepens the trauma.

By structuring penalties this way, the legislation recognizes two critical truths. Younger children are more vulnerable and require stronger protections. And authority figures who abuse their position cause greater damage because children are conditioned to trust them and fear the consequences of speaking out.

Some have raised concerns that defining grooming could criminalize innocent behavior. The act of grooming is manipulative, deceptive, and aimed at exploitation – not normal adult interaction. Prosecutors still bear the burden of proving intent. Parents, teachers, and mentors who act appropriately have nothing to fear from clarity in the law.

Protecting children is a basic responsibility of government and community alike. HB 4 draws a clear line and acknowledges what families, advocates, and prosecutors have long known:
