

Saturday storm causes widespread damage in Carrollton

BY PAXTON MEDIA GROUP

An early morning storm caused “substantial” damage last Saturday in Carrollton.

“The storm didn’t last long but it was substantial,” said Carrollton Mayor Robb Adams, noting there was significant damage throughout the city. “There were several large trees blocking roads, several homes were damaged with structure damage, and then a lot of roofs were ripped off. So, widespread damage throughout the city.”

The storm knocked out power and by late afternoon Saturday there were still 150 residences without power.

Adams commended the work of first responders and volunteers who helped with the cleanup. “I do appreciate everyone who stepped up” to help to get roads cleared and help those impacted by the storm.

Across the Ohio River in Switzerland County,

County Commissioner Ryan Harrison reported a large Maple tree was taken down on the lawn of the Switzerland County Courthouse after the tree suffered a large center split in the storms, forcing preventative action to ensure the tree did not snap and fall on the courthouse.

Commercial developments need people to patronize the businesses and residents need businesses to serve their needs for goods. Balancing the two requires the right combination of each.

“Does the market support it and how do the puzzle pieces fit together?” Jackson asked rhetorically. “Having people on the streets creates a successful commercial district.”

Debbie Cull attended the meeting and listened with interest to the proposals the three firms made to council. It was her family — husband Jeff Cull and his siblings — who finally sold the Wells Farm to the city.

Cull said the family has had numerous offers to buy the property for many years but the timing has not been right until more recently. She said the decision to sell to the city was in part to see that what is developed on the property will benefit the county’s residents and the region.

Cull said the family attached no restrictions on what can be done with the property moving forward but they would like for the farm’s iconic and historic dairy barn to be retained in some fashion. Adams and the council members seemed to also like that idea with the barn maybe renovated into a welcome, event or community center.

Bill Lewis (right), director of the Carroll County Community Development Corporation, looks on as Curt Jackson, a landscape architect with Atlanta-based Bohler Group, talks about the 192-acre tract of land (in green) the city recently bought for $11 million for development.

The tract includes a 10 acre parcel on the west of KY 227 that borders the railroad and Kentucky River — an area that might best serve retail or parks — with the other 182 acres on the east side of KY 227 running from a car dealership on the north to restaurants and hotels on the south near the I-71 interchange slated for multiple commercial and residential uses.

Although located a few miles from the existing city limits, Adams said the plan is to annex the actual KY 227 highway corridor to pick up the newly acquired property without annexing other property alongside KY 227. However, he said Carrollton would be receptive to other annexations along KY 227 — if voluntary on the part of the property owners — and already serves the area for natural gas delivery and wastewater treatment.
