troubles as her brother EJ is suspicious that she put Sophia Choi up to trying to kill his son Johnny in retaliation for...I forget. It’s been going back and forth so long, can anyone remember why?

Kristen goes to see her psycho daughter little Rachel at Bayview Mental Hospital, and her uncle EJ is sitting in her room, grinning. Dramatic music plays.

Lexie Carver confides to Dr Marlena, town psychiatrist, that she’s going to die again after dying the first time and being frozen like a popsicle. Lexie Pop knows what happened to the lab rats that were given the same miracle drugs she was. May they RIP.

Marlena hogs the conversation and starts talking about herself instead while flute music plays in the background. Lexie wonders if she has to pay for that part of the session.

Lexie cries with tears and a snotty, runny nose making Dr Marlena a little nauseous, and she decides to end the session.

Joy Wesley, who wears tiny tops made for a Barbie doll, pushes her daughter Kelsey around in a buggy and then calls Kelsey’s dad, Alex, every five minutes on the phone with some prob-

DRUMMER BOY

By TOM BUGG
Hickman Co.
Historical Society

If my calculations are correct, William “Billy” Cockrum was only about 14 years of age when he signed up as a drummer in 1778 at Southampton, Virginia. Billy was, for sure, still very young at that time and enlisted merely because both his parents were dead, and his neighbors advised him to do so.

He mustered in under Captain McClanahan in the Eighth Regiment under Colonel Hammond. At various times, he marched and drummed his way through North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, quite a ways for a teenage boy. He was at the defeat of Charlotte after which his troop retreated at Salisbury and Hillsborough. And then General Nathanael Greene took the command.

Billy was at Guilford Courthouse and at Shudwell’s Iron Works there in North Carolina (See “Abstracts of Pension Papers Pertaining to Soldiers of the Revolutionary, 1812, and Indian Wars Who Settled on Hickman County, Kentucky”).

The Battle of Guilford Courthouse (March 15, 1781) was a pivotal engagement in the Southern theater of the American Revolutionary War.

The Guilford Courthouse battle was fought near present-day Greensboro, NC, eventually named after General Nathanael Greene.

There were 2100 British soldiers under General Charles Cornwallis fighting General Greene’s 4500 Continental and militia forces. The British suffered 79 killed, 184-185 wounded, and 75 wounded prisoners. The Americans lost 93 killed and 413 wounded.

Though technically a British victory, the battle crippled Cornwallis’s army, ended British recruiting in North Carolina, and set the stage for Greene’s campaign into South Carolina and Cornwallis’s eventual surrender at Yorktown.

As to the reference to Shudwell’s Iron Works, the correct name was probably Speedwell’s Iron Works on Troublesome Creek as it appears in the supporting essay of the North Carolina Highway Historical Marker Program. There are also historical references to Shufield’s Iron Works.

The British often targeted American supply depots and iron works. Patriot forces, often militia and local artisans, defended such furnaces to protect their weapons and tools. Such clashes and skirmishes were part of Greene’s strategy to harass British supply lines and maintain Americans’ resistance in the field.

All in all, Guilford Courthouse was a costly British victory that shifted momentum in the South after weakening Cornwallis. Skirmishes at iron works characterized the Patriot’s efforts to protect and sustain their arms supply. These two engagements clearly illustrate the blend of large-scale battles and small-unit skirmishes used in America’s Southern theater, where the lay of the land, their militia tactics, and the protection of their supply lines were as important as man-to-man combat.

During all of this wartime experience, Billy Corkrum received no regular pay and only got a small amount of pocket money from some of the officers, about $88 a year.

The 1832 Pension Act was passed June 7, 1832 by the 22nd United States Congress as a final supplementary pension act for Revolutionary War veterans. The act provided pensions to eligible Revolutionary War veterans, including musicians like William “Billy” Cockrum, if they met the service criteria.

Billy’s case would have been processed through the sworn declaration and supporting service records required by the law. His certificate of pension was issued January 11, 1834. The total due was $264. His affidavits of 1836 and 1837, when a duplicate pension certificate was issued, clearly show that drummer William “Billy” Cockrum was initially placed on the pension list as a resident here in Hickman County, Kentucky.
